Law in Action

People over their heads in debt may wipe the slate clean through bankruptcy and start all over. Most bankruptcies are "voluntary": the debtor goes to court and files a petition on his own.

Under "involuntary" bankruptcy, creditors are not satisfied with the way the debtor pays his bills. They think some others are getting preferences, or that the debtor is hiding his assets. In such cases, the creditors ask the bankruptcy court to take over the debtor's assets and divide them fairly among all his creditors.

Once in bankruptcy, a debtor has several duties: He must "schedule" his assets and debts. He must tell the court of everything he owns.

THE COURT names a trustee to help it look over the assets and sift through the claims. The trustee collects the debtor's assets. Within six months all creditors must file and prove their claims to the court's satisfaction. Claims are then "allowed." The creditors can share the assets, if any.

The debtor may keep certain things as a grub stake: His clothing, household furniture, a small home, a $250 car, tools, books, his insurance, and some cash.

Certain debts get preference: Taxes, rent due the landlord, wages due to employees, mortgage and special creditors do not lose their security. Creditors with no preference share what's left.

After bankruptcy the debtor gets released from most of the rest that is unpaid. But some debts never get discharged: Taxes, alimony and support payments, bills owed for getting things by fraud, and bills owed because the debtor harmed others on purpose. The debtor might also be denied a discharge if he lied to the court about his assets.

A DEBTOR may go through bankruptcy only once every six years, though he might set up corporations which go broke more often.

The law also has ways for a person or firm to clear up debts outside of bankruptcy. Many a debtor and his creditors work out an agreement or "arrangement" with the court's approval to pay off his debts or a part of them. After carrying out such a plan, the court may discharge the rest of his debts. Such agreements take many forms which are designed so far as possible to the individual's particular circumstances.
